Clutchmyer Clutches Up

by Willard Clutchmyer

It was early morning on the Mercer campi and the fog hung as low as a bunton on a gravedigger's foot. Bleary eyed students shuffled purposefully over the ruins of the once-scenic Tattnall Tech grounds on their way to ignoble periods of gloom known as eight o'clock classes.

Entering the creaky Ad Building, I stopped to read the plaque on the entrance which told of the time when Ghengis Khan and his troops slept there and quartered their horses in what is now the Dean's office. The building was almost new then.

I proceeded up the creaky steps to the fourth floor and waited my turn to climb the rope ladder to the alchemy 101 class which is held in the belfry.

Entering the room I found my classmates softly cursing the janitor who had thoughtfully waited until this mornig, the hottest day of the year, to light the heaters.

We were choosing sides to play musical chairs when I stumbled our aged prof meticulously brushing the gravy from his only tie.

"Class," he began, flashing his famous pseudo-smile. "I have a little something for you this morning that I think you might enjoy. As you already know we had planned to have Dr. Enrico Milquetoast up here this morning to discuss the economic effect of the lower Lithuanian "Black Plague" on point shaving in college basketball, but the immigration authorities got to the good doctor before we did."

"So," he went on, "In lieu of that program I have for you something I feel will be equally enjoyable." "It is," he stopped taking full advantage of his oft-used pregnant pause, "A POP TEST!!!"

"Yes, a pop test!" he screamed as he danced and gesticulated wildly attempting to sacrifice a hapless freshman on the front row to Esophagus, Greek god of wisdom and inventor of the now famous Esophagus tube.

"Pop test?" we echoed, pulling him off the freshman as six fraternity men on the back row hanged themselves in protest.

"This will count three-fourths of your total grade," he gleefully announced as he passed out the sheets of doom.

"You are completely on your honor," he said as he moved everyone two seats apart and stationed monitors in strategic positions around the room.

The test has been called by some "unfair." To those people go the Shinola annual award for the understatement of the year.

The test consisted of one question, it was: "Analyze the social, religious, and political significance of this poem,

"Thirty days has September,
April, May and no wonder,
All the rest eat peanut butter,
Except grandmother, she drives a Buick."

Also tell how this will affect the parking situation here at Mercer."

It was terrible. The only person who passed the test was Maynard Grunch who had the foresight and sagacity to make a "pony" by writing the information on the inside of his eyelids and closing his eyes to get the answers.

As for me I made an F. I knew I would when I handed him my blank paper. "Don't you know anything?" he asked. "Professor," I blushed, "I don't even suspect anything."
